EXTRACTS FROM DE COIN'S "CULTIVATION OF COTTON AND TOBACCO."*

For the information of our readers the

We quote for the information of our readers the following passages from the above recently published work.

"In order to make our work complete as possible, if not beyond a further question, we propose to commence with the most northerly state which produces cotton to a noticeable extent; and, after descending its cotton-growing region, we will follow the cotton-growing belt, as it extends on our way to the south and south-west; and, after treating of that sufficiently, to pass into the next, and then the next, and so on to the last; so that readers may have clear ideas of the various growing regions and climate in America, and be the better qualified to judge of the value of the various qualities and capabilities of soils, and of climates, and of their influence attending foreign and domestic markets, and of the various countries; or unfavorable, as may be the case. And, as stated in the beginning, we intend to write from what our own eyes have seen, and not from hearsay or reports of others; and to be free from every tendency becoming deceptive to the public.

"As we have just mentioned Virginia producing 12,747 bales of cotton in the year 1859, and that it is the most northerly state in a United States, it contains a population of 1,666,318, all told, agreeably to the census of the United States in 1850; and it covers 61,382 square miles of territory, or 10,230,384 acres, and is bounded by North Carolina only, between latitude 36½ degrees to 37 degrees north, and longitude 76 to 78 degrees west from Greenwich; the latitude 36½ being, as estimated, about half to the north of the equator.

"Owing to the general lightness, or sandy character of the soil, which contains but a small quantity of loam, compared with most lands in more easterly regions, the cotton is not so early as in the latter regions. A majority of the bolls before they arrive at maturity, the product of cotton to the

are quite small. We have seen many cotton fields in this part of Virginia, and we question whether any one of them produced over 100 bushels of cotton per acre. In some places we have produced more than 70 to 80 lbs. per acre, and in some of these fields we have produced only a very small quantity of grass or weeds, one hand with a single horse, plough, and hoe, will cultivate twice or three times as many acres as he could attend to in some of the richer lands farther south and south-west. The forest growth in this part of Virginia, are several kinds of oaks, chestnuts, hickories, and some of the iron-wood, and deciduous, or leaf-shedding, with the prevailing of cold weather; and the short and long-leaved pine, both of which are evergreens, are numerous. There are also many evergreen vines on low lands and near the borders of streams, and of cedars about residences, and now and then

In fact, however, a mile west of the district is almost level, and it gradually becomes a little and a little more, and yet more rolling as the middle of the state towards the mountains, is approached westwardly. Where the country becomes very hilly, cotton culture ceases, and the cultivation of Virginia tobacco, in quantity, commences; and the lands which produce but comparatively small number of pines—some of the growths being oaks, hickory and other deciduous trees—are richer than those in the more eastern or lower country towards the Atlantic Ocean. The surface soil is thicker and contains much more decomposed vegetable matter of leaf, and the sub-soil is mostly of a sandy or clayey loam. In this southern part of Virginia

"We now leave our pleasant Virginia friends, and cross the Roanoke River into our native state of North Carolina, which occupies 46,000 square miles of territory, contained within the limits of 37° 18' north latitude and 75° 59' west of cotton of 400 lbs. average weight; in 1859; or nearly eleven and a half bushels to one bale produced in Virginia. The cotton region of this state extends from the Virginia line to the Georgia line, and from 34° 30' north latitude 304, down to 34½ degrees north; and it is almost entirely enclosed by the longitudes of 76½ to 80 degrees west longitude, and contains about 1,000,000 acres of grain growing like wheat, which are similar to those of Virginia.

"As in the counties of Accomac and Northampton, on the western shore of the Chesapeake Bay, and along the Pamlico and some other Virginia counties, so there are sandy lands in North Carolina which contain but very little iron. They are to be found at broken, irregular intervals throughout the whole of the State, and extend from sixty miles wide, across the state from north to south, and increase but sparingly toward a good soil of manure. The surface will be a fine red, buff, outside of the very sandy tracts, and underneath a thin, white sand, and beneath that a hard, nodule, mottled surface. Much of it is capable of producing very fair crops of cotton; and some of it is sown with cotton, but we would not pronounce it strictly within the cotton growing region of the state, except

The pine trees are more valuable to the owner than cotton would be, and, therefore, he preserves the trees. These yellow pines grow tall and straight, their bark is thicker than the white, about three long, large tap-roots run down into deep subsoil composed of tumbled red and yellow clay, and grow from the base of the trunk at irregular intervals. These pines are boxed in their sides near the ground, so that each box the bark is shaved off, turpentine exudes, trickles down, fills the furrows, and is dipped out and put into barrels. The resinous matter is lighter than water, and floats upon the steam filled, and dried; and soon for about seven or eight years, when the tree is cut down, lower square, and sent in bales to market.

"The turpentine is distilled, either in the woods, or by some town distiller who buys the crude article in market. Its distillation is spirit of turpentine, and the residue is called pitch."

"The tops and limbs of the pine, left in the woods, turn to soft wood which is cut and placed placed in a kiln. The wood is used for making shingles, and also for building material. The great heat under the turf causes the tar to exude from the firewood, run down to the low centre of the kiln, and collect in a trough, like a hole in the ground outside, from which it is drawn out and sent to market ready for use. Thus it is seen that no part of the pine is lost," and hence the fortune is made by its owners, and the value of the timber is greatly increased, clearing it away for the cultivation of cotton.

"It is the midst of the yellow pine regions of North Carolina where I have been situated, and here we produce a good deal for cotton and grain, and even very good stock raising. We appear amongst the tall straight white and red oaks. We have known some of these lands to produce fifty bushels of wheat per acre, and other crops as well. In the Altamaha Sound, that would have produced 400 lbs. of clean cotton to the acre, if they had not been overtaken by quantity, and did produce a very handsome, paying quantity."

"The portions of North Carolina cultivated in cotton, are chiefly to the east and west of the yellow pine belt within the mountain range. The cotton raised in this section produces crop of cotton in the State was not more than 200 lbs. to the acre; although there are lands in some of the more fertile sections where it will produce a larger quantity."

To the east of the pine belt, the country is nearly all cleared up, the best surface soil is of dark sand and loam; and in places it is very rich, and underlain with clay often streaked and spotted with iron ore. As the hills rise, the soil becomes gradually more rolling; and as the hills increase in height, the pine almost disappears; giving place to

"We now leave our native State and enter South Carolina, the smallest, by far, of all the Southern States. It comprehends an area of 24,400 square miles; produced in 1856, 1,000,000 bushels of rice, 1,000,000 of cotton, and contained a population of 700,000. The climate is the cotton region is nearly all over the state, between latitudes about 32 to 35 north, and longitude 78 to 82½ west. It is 37 miles long and 17 wide.

"We shall simply state what all will understand, that the soil of the Sea Island region is what the eye deems a small quantity of rich vegetable loam, mixed with a large quantity of chertaceous matter, which means siliceous; and swim, seeking to do what he had better do something, and suggested several things, but they would not adopt any of them, except endeavour to right the boat. This they could not do. He then proposed lashing the oars together, and those who could swim would take the oars and row the boat. This he thought, he then made up his mind to swim abroad, and started in his clothes. Lieutenant S. called him back; upon which he came back, and received orders to stick to the boat. He then said, 'Well sir, it's no use my stopping here. I am dead, and I shall be forgiven.' He then turned round to the little midshipman, and said, 'Mr. Kemble, will you come with me? I will assist you if you find you can't manage it.' Kemble said (though as I have told you, he could swim) 'I will do as you order, but I have no arms, and it is my duty to set an example,' and he repeated the orders. The coxswain then asked all those who could swim, if they would come, and they all answered the same way. Was not that a gallant thing, to stay behind when there were so many who could swim, and live, and all for the sake of being true to the others, and to the orders they had received? Particularly remembering that the example was set by the smallest midshipman in the ship! The coxswain then wished them good-by and succeeded in getting ashore, and the little midshipman had his beautiful night, as if someone were to blow every sail, and and he had not a single thing on ; in fact, when he was picked up next morning he was in a state of delirious state. He said afterwards that he hoped he had not fainted, but he was so much shouting for help ; but he could not assist them, as the place he landed at was uninhabited. A long search was made for the bodies, without effect ; but a steamer coming in afterwards, without having heard of the accident, happened to be passing by at a distance of 1,500 yards, about forty miles from where the accident took place. The funeral service was read on the quarter-deck of their ship, and the usual volleys were fired for those who were so dearly loved. I am sure that the friends of the deceased will be very kind to me, as I am a stranger. I am very kind to you for any other of the party, as he had so many sisters, and seemed so loved and so much adored by all his friends. It will be a terrible blow for them, but I hope the noble way in which he behaved will help to console them."—All the Year Round.

AN ENCHanted GARDEN OF REAL LIFE.—Among the criticisms which have been made on Mr. Tennyson's poem of "Enchanted Garden," it has been objected that it is very impossible to live and to work in his native village so long, without being recognised. The following true story, related by the Jacobite Dr. William King, in the "Political and Literary Anecdotes of his own Times," shows that such an impossibility really does exist. About the year 1798 I knew one Mr. Howe, a sensible, well-natural man, possessed of an estate of £700 or £800 per annum. He married a young lady of a good family in the west of England; her maiden name was Mallet; she was agreeable in her manners, and had made a good match for her husband. Seven or eight years after they had been married, he rose one morning very early, and told his wife he was obliged to go to the Tower to transact some particular business, and that he would be home again in the evening. He did not return, and she never received a note from him, in which he informed her that he was under a necessity of going to Holland, and should probably be absent three weeks or a month. His wife waited for him in vain, and, during that time she neither heard from him nor of him. The evening before he returned, whilst she was at supper, and with her some of her friends and relations, particularly one Dr. Rose, a physician, who had been a great acquaintance of her husband, she says King, "with Dr. Rose, and he frequently entertained me with this remarkable story", a billet, without any name subscribed, was delivered to her, in which it was intimated that he was about to leave him a meeting the next evening in the Birdcage-walk, in St. James's Park. When she had read her billet she tossed it to Dr. Rose, and, laughing, "You see, he has been here, and he has been there, and he has got a gallant." Rose, who perused the note with more attention, declared it to be Mr. Howe's handwriting; this surprised all the company, and so much affected Mrs. Howe that she fainted away. However, she soon recovered, and then she told them that she had wife, with the other gentlemen and ladies who were then at supper, should attend Mrs. Howe the next evening to the Birdcage-walk. They had not been there long when Mrs. Howe's husband came to them, and after saluting his friends, and embracing his wife, walked home with her, and lived together in great harmony to the day of his death. But the most curious part of my tale remains to be told. In the year 1790, Mrs. Howe resided in a house in Jermyn-street, near St. James's Church. He went no farther than to a little street in Westminster, where he took a room, for which he paid five or six shillings a week. He was a very particular and fastidious himself by wearing a black wig (for he was a fair man), he remained in this habitation the whole time of his absence. He had had two children by his wife, a son and a daughter, who were both now living at that time, but they both died young, a few years after. However, during their lives, the second of third year after their father had disappeared, Mrs. Howe was obliged to apply for an Act of Parliament to provide for her children, and to secure a maintenance, and a provision for herself out of it during his absence, as it was uncertain whether he was alive or dead. This Act he suffered to be solicited and passed, and enjoyed the benefit of it for some progress it is in the vetes, in a little coffee-house and lodgings which he frequented. Upon quitting his house and family in the manner I have mentioned, Mrs. Howe at first objected, as she could not conceive any other cause for such conduct. But she was so much attracted a large field unknown to her, and by that means involved himself in difficulties which he could not easily surmount; and for some days she lived in great anxiety and distress. She was a mother of six or seven, of servants, executors, &c. But nothing of this kind happened: on the contrary, he did not only leave his estate quite free and unincumbered, but he paid the bills of every account, and he left her more than he had any dealings in. And upon examining his accounts at the time after he was gone, proper receipts and discharges were found from all persons, whether tradesmen or others, with whom he had any manner of transactions or money dealings. Mrs. Howe, who had several children, thought proper to lessen her family of servants and the expenses of her housekeeping, and therefore removed from her house in Jermyn-street to a little house in St. James's, called Golden-square. Just over against her lived one Salt, a Quaker. I knew Salt, who related to me the particulars which I have here mentioned, and many others which have been my memory. About ten years after Howe's abolition he arrived at the age of 70. He was a Quaker Salt, and was at length in such a degree of intimacy with him that he usually dined with Salt once or twice a week. From the room in which — Leaves Home. — During the past two years the lifeboats of the Royal National Lifeboat Institution have been manned, on all occasions, by about 12,000 persons, and it is a gratifying and encouraging fact to find that, with the exception of the two poor men who jumped out of the lifeboats during the recent storm, on the 24th ultimo, not a single life has been lost from the lifeboats during these two years. With one or two exceptions the boats have been readily and promptly put to sea during the recent storms. The National Lifeboat Institution has now 132 lifeboats under its management.

POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS FOR THE NEW YEAR.— The Post Office authorities have announced several new arrangements for the New Year, and the inconveniences of the pattern post, having been generally to the British West Indies on terms similar to those regulating the postage to other colonies. Facilities have also been given for the transmission of patterns and designs to the Colonies, and the Colonies maintain post-offices. The altered condition of things in Denmark has involved a change in the postal arrangements of the country with regard to its colonies in the West Indies, and henceforward letters for St. Thomas and the other islands, hitherto sent by the ordinary mail, will be sent by a special mail, and will be charged additional postage. It will be noticed a slight relaxation of the restrictions which the Russian Government place upon the admission of foreign newspapers into the empire. For the future, foreign printed papers may be sent to members of the royal family, to the Emperor's court, to the Imperial corps and other persons duly qualified to handle such dangerous weapons. Non-political newspapers and publications may also be received by the post, not only when addressed to established bookshouses in Russia, but also to the private residences of the the Imperial Public Library, and to the Academy of Sciences in Russia.—European Times, December 25.
